Subject: Oppose New CDC Regulations

Dear Dr. Gerberding:

Please withdraw the proposed new CDC regulations that threaten proven effective HIV prevention efforts. Rather than promote comprehensive, science based prevention methods, these guidelines blatantly disregard tried and true programs, taking decision making powers away from the groups most familiar with the at-risk populations and placing it instead in the hands of ideologically motivated political appointees.

Further detrimental is the required inclusion of information on the ineffectiveness of condom use in preventing the spread of HIV and other STDs, regardless of the fact that most medical bodies state that in the absence of an HIV-preventing vaccine, the condom is the single most effective tool available to protect someone from contracting or spreading HIV. Teaching about condoms does not encourage sexual activity, just as many studies show that abstinence only programs do not lower the rate. Rather it is essential that the CDC continue to support models that are comprehensive in nature, catering to differing need and lifestyles.

I would go on to add the I believe scientific integrity demands that you share all pertinent information in a plain and timely manner. You should be requiring all data be reported, not propaganda. There is a moral and ethical implication in that, by omission, severe harm and probably deadly consequences for the patient are possible. It is not good science nor good neighbors to hold lethal secrets.

Integrity is measured from results.

Yours truly,
